that, as you can see from its mounting; but, as I have said, I am pressed for money, and you shall have it a bargain."
"I have but five hundred francs with me," said the nobleman.

"That, my lord, would not be an easy thing to do with an unloaded gun; and, although I have several loaded pistols with me, I do not think it would be judicious of me to lend them to you, in your present temper. Spare your epithets; I am not a robber on this occasion, at least, but have made a regular commercial transaction with ou;" and with these words the rascal gave an ironical laugh and disappeared into the thicket.

Next day the nobleman notified hi banker, so that the payment of the cheque should be stopped; but Car-touche had been beforehand with him and received the money. It seems that the robber, for some reason or

One day he went to a tavera in the neighborhood of Paris, to seek for refreshment. The man and his wife appeared to be in trouble about something, and Cartouche inquired of them the cause. He was told that they were unable to pay their rent, and the owner of the premises had threatened to eject them. "How much do you owe?" asked Cartouche. "Three hundred francs," replied the inn-keeper. After a moment's reflection, Cartouche said: "You seem to be good, honest people enough, and I should like to help you out of your difficulty, by associates of Bliss. Notify your landlord to come to-morrow at three o'clock to receive his rent, the amount of which has been lent to you by a friend, and be sure that he gives you a receipt in full."

Well, the landlord came at the appointed hour and pocketed three thousand francs, (£120), and went off his way rejoicing. As he was passing through a piece of woodland, however, on his way to Paris, he was confronted by Cartouche and one of his gang, who robbed him of all the money ke had about nim, amounting to more

Lee's Surrender. A great controversy has arisen with regard to some points of the surrender at Appmattox Court House, it having been asserted and denied that Gen. Lee surrendered his sword to Gen. Grant. The attention of the latter being called to one of the accounts and his version of the affair being asked for, he wrote as follows, just before leaving Washington:

Washington, March 23.—C. A.
Boutelle, Esq., Bangor: The Bangor
Whig and Consier's account is strictly correct, except in this: nothing was said about swords, sidearms, baggage or private horses, until I wrote the terms of surrender, in which I gave them, at which Gen. Lee was much affected, and said those terms would have a good effect upon his army. He had an apparently a new uniform and a magnificent sword-such as is not usually worn in the field-and it cortainly left the impression that the expectation was to surrender it. Nothing was said in the preliminary con-versation to warrant the assumption that anything more was to be granted
